THE RECOVERY PROCESS

Recovery from opioid use initially centers around physical stabilization; specifically, the management of opioid withdrawal. This is an essential step to reduce symptoms related to withdrawing from opioids.

Medication Assisted Treatment is the use of medications, in combination with counseling and behavioral therapies, to provide a “whole-patient” approach to the treatment of substance use disorders. The Opioid Treatment Program provides the option of being prescribed medication in a safe, controlled environment to overcome the use of an opioid.

There is no “one size fits all” approach to opioid use treatment. People who use opioids benefit from treatment for varying lengths of time, including lifelong treatment. Ongoing outpatient medication treatment is linked to better outcomes than treatment without medication.

A comprehensive wellness approach assists the individual to stabilize, feel relief from withdrawal symptoms, and establish and maintain recovery. When a person participates in a recovery program, they are taking steps toward managing their substance use and regaining a healthy life.

Medications offered through the Opioid Treatment Program includes methadone, Suboxone, buprenorphine, naltrexone and Vivitrol.
